Harbor Notes

The quick brown fox walked along the harbor wall before the morning boats came in from the bay.

Nobody on the long pier spoke about the weather, because the lights were steady and the water was calm.

A patient writer counts every page, checks every line, and leaves nothing for the reader to trip over.

When the last boat was tied up, the keeper closed the gate and walked home under the yellow lamps.

The lighthouse keeper remembered every storm that had ever crossed the bay in winter.

On the second page the ferry was late and the market had already closed for the day.

The harbor master wrote the tide down in a green book that nobody else was allowed to read.
